From 2000-2008, China was the leading country for U.S. international adoptions. There are now approximately 70,000 Chinese children being raised in the United States. Wo Ai Ni Mommy explores what happens when an older Chinese girl is adopted into an American family. This film reveals the complicated gains and losses that are an inherent aspect of international, transracial adoption.

In 2007 Donna and Jeff Sadowsky of Long Island, New York submitted their dossier to adopt eight-year old Fang Sui Yong from Guangzhou, China. From the very first moment Sui Yong meets her new mother, Donna, we get a real sense of the emotional confusion and loss Sui Yong experiences, as adoption workers translate their first words of communication. This day will change Sui Yong's life, forever. Language, habits, food, everything she knows will never be the same. Her new life in America is filled with happiness and confusion. As she struggles to survive in this new world, we witness her transform into a lively, outspoken American. Sui Yong has become someone neither she nor Donna could have imagined. In a sense, she's the same girl Donna met in Guangzhou all those months ago - and yet she's utterly different.

FAMILIES WITH CHILDREN FROM CHINA MISSION STATEMENT

Celebrate Educate Advocate

We are a vibrant community of families united by the experience of adopting children from China. We honor our children's heritage, celebrate the diversity of our families, and advocate for their acceptance and respect. Through events, publications, online resources and community activities:

- We encourage adoption by providing information and sharing our experiences
- We help families learn about China and Chinese culture to strengthen our children's pride in their background and heritage
- We sponsor programs that support the evolving needs of our families and assist our children as they grow to understand their life stories
- We provide assistance to children who remain in China's orphanages
- We promote awareness of our community's concerns to schools, governmental bodies, cultural institutions, Asian American organizations, adoption agencies, and other groups

Families with Children from China is a 501 c(3) tax exempt organization
